In a region where design focuses on environmentalism and sustainability, how will our definition of regionalism evolve amid an influx of new ideas associated with Seattle’s growth? Which regional design concepts will remain the same and which design rules will evolve? Join us as we explore what it means to design within the context of changing rules, demographics, and definitions of home & life in the Pacific Northwest.

TEEN WORKSHOP | DENSE AND LIVABLE
04.02.16 11:00am - 1:00pm | At Weber Thompson
225 Terry Ave N Suite 200

Seattle’s population is booming! At this interactive teen workshop we will explore how other cities have increased in density to accommodate newcomers. Youth will work in teams alongside architects, to build models and design their own affordable and livable housing solutions!

Ages 11-16

MARY JOHNSTON
Johnston Architects
Mary is an architect who has worked in Seattle for 30 years. Mary and her husband and architectural partner Ray Johnston founded Johnston Architects in 1991. Their eclectic portfolio includes libraries, multi-family projects, commercial projects, single family homes, fire stations, health care facilities and even an animal shelter.

Mary is past Chair of the Seattle Design Commission and former member of the Seattle Public Art Advisory Committee. Mary is currently the President of AIA Seattle. She has taught studio design classes at the University of Washington and reinforces in her students the obligation of architects to be active citizens and use their skills to make their community better.

Mary was elected to the AIA College of Fellows in 2008.

RON ROCHIN
Miller Hull Partnership
Ron Rochon has 20 years of design experience and serves as Managing Partner of The Miller Hull Partnership. He also serves as sustainability and technology leader at the firm, where his career-spanning passion for exploring how architecture impacts the significant role buildings play in carbon emissions and carbon management informs design solutions incorporating science and technology. His vision and leadership in advancing processes and systems that facilitate research and computer based modeling is integral to solving complex high performance design problems. In addition to his oversight roles, Ron serves as a Partner-in-Charge on several projects, including the recently completed Bullitt Center in Seattle – a Living Building that satisfies its own energy, water and waste needs, and widely considered the most energy efficient commercial office building in the U.S. He was elevated to the AIA’s College of Fellows in 2015. Ron earned both Bachelor of Architecture and Master of Architecture degrees at the University of Washington.

JAIME GILLIN
GRAY Magazine
Jaime Gillin is the Director of Editorial & Content Strategy at GRAY Magazine, North America’s only media dedicated exclusively to design centered on the Pacific Northwest. In this role, she helms GRAY’s print and digital magazines, oversees content and brand strategy, and develops programming, partnerships, and events that celebrate and reflect the intellect and culture of leading design in this region. Established in 2011, GRAY presents the best in interiors, architecture, fashion, art, and design—encouraging a global audience of more than 1 million designers and consumers to look to the Pacific Northwest for sourcing, inspiration, and leadership. Before working for GRAY, Gillin was Deputy Editor of Dwell Magazine in San Francisco, and before that she was a freelance journalist, traveling the world and writing about design, culture, and travel—and the places they intersect—for publications including the New York Times, Travel + Leisure, and Elle Decor, among others. In 2012, she was named one of “10 Design Tweeters to Know Right Now” by the Huffington Post.

MICHELLE LANKER, MODERATOR
Lanker Design
Michelle started Lanker Design LLC in 2013 after working for large corporate firms for the first 13 years of her career. She wanted to focus on the projects that she felt were the most impactful both for her and her clients. Michelle worked on everything from K-12 Schools to boutique retail projects early in her career and as a sole practitioner has applied that experience to new project types like custom sustainable residential design and eco-friendly agricultural design while working for clients like Rogue Creamery in southern Oregon.

Michelle grew up in Ohio and attended college at the University of Tennessee, Knoxville where she graduated with a Bachelor of Architecture degree in 2000. She has lived in three distinct regions in this country and she considers the time spent in each of these regions, along with the domestic and international travel she has been lucky enough to experience, a very important part of her perspective on life that includes devotion to family and friends, great respect for many different cultures, and stewardship for the environment. She now calls Seattle home and lives with her husband and two dogs in the Capitol Hill neighborhood part of the time and on a floating home in Lake Union for the other part. In her free time she enjoys volunteering with great organizations like SAF, exploring with her dogs, and biking anywhere and everywhere both for work and for pleasure.
